Task 12 | Internship Reflection

Name-Bhavika Santosh Bhoir | Emplyoo ID- SYKT.INT.1823

This report reflects on the tasks I completed during my internship with Sanyukt Organisation, the skills I gained along the way, the challenges I worked through, and a few thoughts on how the experience could be made even better for future interns.

1 Tasks Completed

Over the course of this internship, I worked on a wide range of assignments that exposed me to different areas of HR practice. I prepared a presentation introducing the organisation, drafted job descriptions and recruitment posters for the Marketing and Content Writer internships, and researched current trends shaping human resource management today. I also studied Google's Project Oxygen as a case study in data-driven leadership, summarised an industry report on the future of recruiting, and designed an infographic explaining the recruitment-to-onboarding journey. Later tasks involved promoting Sanyukt's social media presence, reaching out to potential candidates for an open opportunity, and writing an article on how HR analytics can support employee and volunteer retention in non-profit settings. Each task gave me a different lens through which to understand HR — some analytical, some creative, some communication-focused — and together they built a fuller picture of what the function actually involves.

2 Key Learnings

This internship taught me that HR is far more layered than I initially assumed. Writing job descriptions and recruitment posters helped me understand how organisations translate a role into something that attracts the right candidates, while the research report and case study pushed me to read critically and connect academic concepts to real practice. Working on the HR analytics article was particularly useful — it made me think about how data such as attendance, participation, and exit feedback can inform decisions, while also reminding me that numbers should support human judgement rather than replace it. I also picked up practical skills: structuring presentations clearly, designing visual content that communicates information simply, and writing within strict word limits. None of this makes me an expert, but I now have a much stronger practical foundation than when I started.

3 Challenges & How I Handled Them

One recurring challenge was working within tight deadlines while still producing something professional, especially for tasks I hadn't attempted before, like designing posters and infographics. I managed this by looking at reference examples first and leaving myself time to revise rather than submitting a first draft. Topics like HR analytics and current HR trends were also unfamiliar territory, so I had to slow down and read multiple sources before I felt confident writing about them. Turning brief task instructions into a complete, polished deliverable took some trial and error, particularly for the presentation and the recruitment posters, where I had to make several design decisions on my own. Reaching out to people for the recruitment task also pushed me outside my comfort zone, since it meant clearly explaining an opportunity and following up with genuine interest rather than a generic message.

4 Suggestions

A few things could make this experience even more useful for future interns. Having a sample format or reference example for more complex tasks, such as the infographic or the case study, would help reduce the initial uncertainty of not knowing what a finished version should look like. A short guidance note on tools like Canva for interns unfamiliar with design work would also help. Some brief feedback after major submissions, like the presentation or the research report, would make it easier to know what to carry forward into later tasks. Overall, though, the structure of the internship — moving through different types of HR work — was genuinely well thought out.

Final Reflection

Looking back, this internship gave me a much broader understanding of HR than I expected going in. I enjoyed the variety — moving between research one week and poster design the next kept things interesting, and working on the recruitment tasks made the field feel less abstract and more like something I could actually see myself doing. I don't think I've mastered any of these areas, but I've built a real, practical starting point, and I'm leaving this internship with more confidence in my ability to take on unfamiliar professional tasks.
